NONSENSE ABOUT SMUT. From the Rural New Yorker.

At the present season of the year nothing is more commonly seen in the rural press than accounts of this or that man having lost several head of cattle from eating smut in stalkfields: and the account is usually fortifled by a statement that the owner cut some of the aximals open and found large quantities of the alleged deadly smut In their stomachs

I venture to say that 10,000 cattle die from other causes to every one that dies from eating smut. The National Agricultural Department exploded the smut theory years ago, when, to test the harmfulness or harm'essness of it, it had some cows tied up and fed on smut almost by the bushel, for days and weeks, and, instead of promptly dying, as other are alleged to do, they flourished and grew fat.

The trouble with the cattle arises from their eating the corn-todder in such quantities and under such circumstaures as they do. Most farmers, in the early part of the winter, are in a great kurry to finish husking their corn in order to pasture the cattle on the stalks; prior to this or in the meantime the cattle have been taken from pasture before accommodations were really ready for them elsewhere, and kept on half rations and promises, from day to day, for some weeks in anticipation of the stalk-field being soon ready to receive them, where it is expected they can tate first-rate care of them-elves for a considerable time, while the always kurried farmer 15 "catching up" with some other work, put off already too long is order that the corn gathering might be pushed.

The cattle go into the stalks lank and hungry, and reaching right and left gulp down at a fearful rate the shucks and corn they find in such abundance, until they we as tight as drums. There may or may not be water in the field; if there is, the cattle may not know where to find it, and if shey do it may be dif Scult of access, or perhaps frozen over, and they wander off to lie down without having had the water necessary to thoroughly moisten the barrel or more of heating grain and woody fiber within them, asting as an irritant from the first. This mass to be properly digested must be mixed with enough fluid from some source to separate and readily float it; without any, or with none at the right time, it heats and impacts, becomes a dry, immovoble mass, generating fever de irium, and resulting in speedy death About the next Sunday (which will probably be the first day the farmer can find the time to spare), the owner will stroll out to "look up the cattle," and the probability is that some will be found that are valuable only for their hides; whereupon the s nut stories are revived and the annual lamentations

Carrier-Fruit-Delivery Through Connecting Lines.

A railroad company agreed to carry about 500 baskets of pears from Ogden, in Utah Territory, to New York in twelve days. The delivery in this time required the use, for a part of the way, of the passenger trains, and the company expressly agreed to take the fruit to Omaha, Neb., by its passenger train, and to send it from that point by fast treight line to New York. The defendant's road did not run as far east as Omaha. By reason of some delay east of Omaha, a part of the frui became damaged, and the consignee retused to receive it, and for the loss the shipper sued. A shipping-receipt was given wiich contained provisions that the company not agree to earry the pears by any particular train, or in time for any particular market, being in the face of the verbal contract. The shipper recovered judgment, and the case, Pereira vs. Central Pacific Railroad Company, to the Supreme Court of 'ailfornia, where the judgment was affirmed, Judge Ross, in the opinion. said: 1. Whether the fruit was carried under the verbal agreement and under the shipping receipt was a question for the jury, and they have found that the shipping receipt was not to control the verbal contract. 2. The defendat under took to carry the pears to New York, and the connecting companies are to be deemed to be its agents, for whose negligence it is liable.
